

Website Design & Build Agreement

Between: Kidus Dereje Zewde (“I”, “me”)

And: The New Practice (“The New Practice”, “you”), c/o Nathaniel Bruce

Date: August 19, 2026

This is the whole agreement between us. It replaces anything discussed beforehand. Changes need to be in writing and agreed by both of us.

1. What I’m building

A marketing website for The New Practice. Its job is to present The New Practice and generate enquiries.

It includes:

- Design and build of seven templates, each working properly at desktop, tablet and mobile sizes:
 1. Landing page (home)
 2. Standard interior content page
 3. Treatment / programme page
 4. Team profile page
 5. Hospitality / residences page
 6. Index or listing page
 7. Enquiry page, including the enquiry form
- Site-wide header, primary navigation (including mobile) and footer, delivered alongside the templates and not counted as one of them
- Build-out of approximately 50 pages of content using those templates, from content you supply
- Motion and interaction: considered, restrained animation — page and element transitions, scroll-triggered reveals, hover and focus states, and small interactive touches — specified during design and built to respect reduced-motion accessibility settings
- Art direction for photography: a written shot list, mood and framing guidance, and review of your selects (up to two rounds), so the imagery hangs together with the design
- Headline and structure guidance: suggested headlines, page structure and content hierarchy, plus comments on how your material is organised
- A content management system with admin access, so your team can edit page text and images after launch, plus a short handover walkthrough
- The underlying design system and front-end code
- Search and AI-answer visibility, built in: semantic markup, structured data (schema.org), page titles, meta and Open Graph tags, XML sitemap and robots directives, an `llms.txt` file, clean URL structure and internal linking, image alt text, and page speed tuned against Core Web Vitals
- Setup of one analytics tool on your account, with basic enquiry-form goal tracking
- Deployment, go-live, and launch support: I’m on hand through launch and fix defects in my own original code free for 60 days afterwards (see section 15)

On search, to be straight with you: I build to current best practice for Google and for AI answer engines, and I hand over the site set up properly. What I can’t do is guarantee a ranking position, a traffic number, or that any particular AI system will cite you. Those outcomes sit with third parties whose systems change without notice, and they depend heavily on the content you supply and on the credentials and authorship shown on the site.

It does not include payment processing, bookings or scheduling, e-commerce, client portals, logins, or the collection or storage of any client or health information beyond the details a person types into the enquiry form.

2. Design direction

The New Practice should read as ultra-premium, discreet, clinical and sophisticated.

The Kusunacht Practice is a shared reference point for quality — the level of visual sophistication, restraint, premium presentation and user experience we're both aiming for. It doesn't need to be matched feature-for-feature: its layouts, code, imagery, copy and proprietary elements are theirs, and none of that is being reproduced here.

The design will be original throughout.

Approval is measured against the design direction we agree at the outset and the template designs you sign off under section 6. Once you've approved the templates, they set the standard for the rest of the build.

3. What's not included

Unless we agree otherwise in writing and I quote for it separately:

- Commissioned photography, videography or illustration — I'll art-direct it as described in section 1, but I don't shoot, commission, attend shoots or retouch
- Copywriting, editing or proofreading — I'll advise on headlines and structure, but you write the copy, and all clinical content is yours
- Typeface licensing (you buy and hold the licences you need)
- Translation or any second language version
- 3D, WebGL, video-driven scroll sequences or bespoke animation systems
- Ongoing maintenance, updates or support after the 60-day period referred to in section 15
- Hosting, domains, CMS, analytics and any other third-party services or subscriptions — these are on your accounts and your billing from day one
- Ongoing SEO or GEO work after launch: keyword campaigns, link building, rank or citation tracking, reporting, advertising, or content strategy
- Formal accessibility audit or certification

Happy to help point you in the right direction on any of these.

4. Your content

The New Practice supplies all final content: text, images, logos, and anything else that goes on the site.

- You give me a single content document covering the full site before I start on the main templates. I'll review it within 5 business days and tell you what's missing.
- Content comes to me in editable text form, and images at usable resolution.
- You confirm you have the rights to everything you send me.

If content is late, the project pauses. When your content arrives, I restart at the next point I have available in my schedule — I can't hold capacity open indefinitely, so the original dates won't necessarily hold. Delays caused by late content aren't my responsibility and don't change the fee. If a pause runs past 60 days, either of us can end this agreement under section 14.

5. Timeline

Four to six weeks of my working time, starting once I've reviewed your content document, covers the full site — all templates and all pages.

Within that, the two-week mark is for the templates in section 1 only — the core page designs, not the full fifty-page build. Populating, refining and launching the rest of the site continues through the remaining weeks.

That clock stops during any pause under section 4, and during any period I'm waiting on your feedback or approvals.

6. Page count, revisions and change orders

Pages. Around 50 pages is the plan. Up to 55 is included at no extra charge. Between 56 and 60, talk to me and we'll sort it out sensibly. Beyond 60 pages, we agree a change order first.

Revisions. Two rounds on the templates, plus two consolidated rounds across the whole site before launch. Feedback comes to me collected in one place, from Nathaniel Bruce or one other person The New Practice names in writing.

Change orders. A change order is a short note from me setting out the extra work, the cost and the effect on the schedule, agreed by you before I start. One is needed for:

- Templates or page types beyond the seven in section 1
- More than 60 pages of content
- Functionality beyond the enquiry form
- Changes to your brand identity after templates are approved
- Revisions beyond the rounds included above
- Anything listed in section 3

7. Fee and payment

CAD $7,500 in total, inclusive of GST.

WHEN	AMOUNT
On approval of the templates in section 1	$3,750
On practical completion	$3,750

Delivery means the templates are deployed to the staging URL and I've emailed you to say so. Once delivered, I'll walk you through them — a review call works well for this — and you confirm approval. Approval won't be unreasonably withheld, and doesn't require the templates to be populated with final content; that comes after this milestone. The first payment is due on that approval, not on delivery alone.

Practical completion means the site is built, content is in, and it's ready to go live. If launch hasn't happened within 30 days of that point for reasons outside my control, I invoice anyway.

Payment is by bank transfer in Canadian dollars. International transfers take time, so invoices are due 21 days from the date I send them, and the amount that reaches my account has to be the full amount — any transfer, intermediary or currency-conversion charges are yours. Late invoices carry interest at 1.5% per month.

I'll keep to the schedule in section 5 whether or not a transfer has landed yet. But control only moves once money has actually reached me: the account handovers in section 8 and the transfer of ownership in section 10 happen only once each payment has cleared — approval triggers the invoice, not the handover.

8. Accounts and handover

You create the accounts the site runs on — hosting, CMS, analytics and domain — in The New Practice's name and on your billing. I'll tell you which platforms before you set anything up. You give me admin access so I can build.

The handover happens in two stages:

1. On approval of the templates, once the first payment has cleared, I transfer primary ownership of those accounts to you. I keep an admin seat so I can finish the rest of the work.
2. On practical completion, once the final payment has cleared, you change the passwords, I remove my access, and I discard any credentials I hold. From that point the accounts are yours alone.

At final handover you receive everything needed for another developer to take the site over: the complete source repository including its commit history, design source files, exported assets and image derivatives, any fonts or third-party assets you hold licences for, and short written notes covering how to run, build and deploy the site. I'll walk your team or a future developer through it.

9. The concept site

I built the concept site at my own risk, before we had any agreement. It's mine. Signing this agreement brings it into the project — it's the starting point for the landing page. There's no separate charge for it and no credit against the fee; the $7,500 covers the finished site including that work.

Until this agreement is signed and paid in full, The New Practice has no rights in it. If we don't proceed, I take it down and it stays with me.

10. Who owns what

Your brand identity is yours. The New Practice name, tagline, symbol, colour palette and type direction existed before I was involved and they're unaffected by this agreement. I claim nothing in them.

The website becomes yours on final payment. Once the second payment has cleared, I assign to The New Practice full ownership of the site design, the front-end code, the design system and any placeholder copy I wrote for this project. You can modify it, extend it, or hand it to another developer, and you don't need my permission for any of that.

Until then it's mine, and you have access to it only for review and staging purposes.

One clarification. The site is built using publicly available programming languages, frameworks and libraries — open-source or third-party-licensed tools that anyone can access, and that were never mine to own in the first place. Assigning you the code doesn't and can't change that: those underlying tools stay available to you, to me, and to anyone else, under their own public licences, exactly as they were before this project.

Fonts, stock images and third-party services work the same way — licensed to you directly by whoever owns them, not by me.

11. Portfolio

The New Practice's business is confidential, so before I use its name, imagery or identifiable screenshots in my portfolio, case studies, award or competition entries, or any marketing, I'll ask you in writing and wait for your written approval. That approval won't be unreasonably withheld.

Either way, I won't disclose anything confidential about how The New Practice runs, and I won't identify, reference or use material relating to any client of The New Practice.

12. Confidentiality

Each of us keeps the other's confidential information private and uses it only for this project. That covers business plans, client information, unpublished content, commercial terms and anything else clearly not public. It doesn't cover information that's already public, or that either of us is required to disclose by law. This carries on after the project ends.

13. Clinical and regulatory claims

The New Practice delivers health and wellness services and I'm not a clinician.

Everything on the site that touches clinical, medical, therapeutic, regulatory, licensing, outcome, credential or testimonial matters is yours to write, check and approve. Your own people review it before launch. I present it as you give it to me and I make no warranty about it — including whether it meets professional advertising standards, health regulator requirements, or privacy law.

If a claim, complaint or investigation arises out of that content, The New Practice covers me for it, including reasonable legal costs.

14. If either of us wants to stop

Either of us can end this agreement with 14 days' written notice.

If that happens, you pay for the work actually completed up to that point — any milestone already reached, plus the demonstrable work done toward the next one, which I'll set out for you in a written breakdown. Once you've paid for it, I hand it over in usable source form. Work that hasn't been paid for stays mine, and I'll remove my access to your accounts.

15. Limits

I'll fix defects in my own original code free of charge for 60 days after launch. That covers bugs and defects in the work delivered under this agreement — it doesn't cover new functionality, design changes, or anything added or altered at your request after launch, which is chargeable as new work. After the 60 days, all fixes are chargeable.

If something goes wrong, my total liability is capped at the fees you've paid me, and neither of us is liable to the other for lost profits or other indirect losses.

16. Law

This agreement is governed by the laws of Alberta and the courts of Alberta have jurisdiction.
